19. The police were on hand in a commendably short time. They began banging at the narrator's front door. When nobody responded, they broke into the house. They searched downstairs and upstairs messing up everything. They opened all the doors and windows. They pulled the drawers and furniture. They began to ransack the floor, pulled beds away from the walls and tore clothes off the hooks in the closets. They also pulled the suitcases and boxes off the shelves. Later, they heard some creaking in the attic. They stepped into the attic. As his grandfather thought that they were deserters from Meade's army, so he started shooting at them. Then he went back to bed. The cops were unwilling to leave without getting their hand on somebody. They felt it was a defeat for them. They began to poke into things again and finally left the place.

20. The central theme of the poem is about the oneness of mankind. Though there are many countries, races, colour, languages, castes and creeds all are human beings. We occupy the same land and die in the same land. Hands work hard, eyes witness the same life and we are all fed by peaceful harvests. Attacking others who are neighbours in the same planet is nothing but harming oneself. Hence no land is foreign, no man is a stranger.

21. Machines aren't perfect after all and Nature always wins over. Machines aren't miraculous creations. They are nothing more than the creations of the human brain.
